Learning to ride well is simply a matter of balance. Balance comes after a rider has learned to relax and to coordinate his body movement with his horse's actions. The best way to learn balance is to begin riding bareback. After learning to ride the horse at a walk, the gait should gradually be increased leads to saddle sores.

To mount, stand at the horse's left shoulder and face his rear. Hold the reins in the left hand and grasp the mane well back. Keep the left rein shorter than the right—this prevents the horse from moving against you. With the right hand, surrup the left foot, then grasp the

to a full gallop.

When saddling a horse, place the saddle blanket well forward and slide it backward into place. This smooths out the hair beneath, preventing gall sores. When the cinch is tightened, slip the fingers between the cinch and the horse's belly to make certain that the cinch is not too tight. A too tight cinch also hain, bounce lightly and swing into the saddle.

Never ride with tied reins. Learn to carry the reins in the left hand. Keep one rein between the thumb and index finger and the other between index and second finger. If you wear boots, let the instep rest in the stirrup. This relaxes the leg muscles and helps prevent riding fatigue.

Proper stirrup length is one of the most important factors in riding comfortably, therefore, in good riding. The easiest way to determine proper stirrup length is to stand straight in the stirrups. If the folded hand can be comfortably placed between the crotch and the saddle seat, the stirrups are of the right length.

Stirrups adjusted to this length allow the rider to leave the saddle seat and ride the stirrups occasionally, when the horse is running. When the knees are slightly bent to absorb shock, the body becomes a part of the horse's motion. The blood circulates faster and saddle fatigue is considerably lessened.

Only a greenhorn rider, or a callous show-off, ever runs his mount up or down hill. Forcing the horse up-grade can result in lasting damage to a good mount, just as running him down-grade, or on hard pavement, can make a "stove-up" nag out of a fine saddle animal.

A good rider also considers his horse's comfort. After a ride, the horse should be rubbed down. His bit should be washed off and the saddle hung up so that air can circulate underneath. The saddle blanket should be turned bottom-side up so that it can dry thoroughly. Above all, a hot or sweaty horse should never be allowed to drink his fill of water.
